" To one of the Quixtar IT team members, I'm a "known Killers fan.

Yes, it's optional, but so is most professional accreditation.

Until then, I'm staying at home and keeping my germs to myself.

I was personally responsible for "outing" Mr.

I concur, that Wal-Mart is probably thankful that there are people who seek the best value for their dollar.

I recall hearing some of the comments about us not advertising because we invest our money into IBO bonuses rather than massive advertising budgets as well.

In blogs, or in creative.

Glad you are feeling better.

hours were a measure of commitment and the more the better.

Will do so later this week.

In my experiences online and through discussions with other ex-IBO's, it's pretty clear that True North is not the only organization that teaches this.

As for the singing in the car thing: I do it all the time and loudly.

I guess too many brain cells died in that third floor room in Memorial Hall or maybe its just the advancing years.

So I look at the rake and pile of leaves and think, not now, not yet.

It's owned by Jim and Nancy Dornan.

That said, we have acknowledged the potential for abuse and have taken numerous actions over the years.

I get the feeling you may have taken some experience and unfairly generalized from it.

The program, by itself, does nothing to address the scam.

And I don't pay attention to whether other people are noticing that I'm singing in the car, as some of my colleagues here at Quixtar can attest.

Your explanation was darn good and despite going into "marketer phase" there for a sec, that was a pretty darn good "non-corporate" response.

That might be concentration, it might be vitamin supplements derived from natural resources, or it might be the highest ratings for air or water filtration.

Because quantity, especially in creative work, doesn't always mean quality.
